Priority
seating

*The green line is the most inaccessible rail on the mbta.

All green line cars are equipped with priority seating near the doors of every train. However, not all trains have space available for riders with wheeled mobility devices.

Of the spaces that exist, all are very small and are frequently taken by able-bodied passengers during on-peak hours due to the scarce amount of seating and standing room for passengers. The signs that signal priority seating and wheel chair spaces also lack readability and impression.

As it stands, the current size of the green line cars are no where near proportional to its ridership. It is evident that these cars need to be redesigned to not only hold more people, but also to provide more space for passengers with wheeled mobility devices. If possible, these spaces could be designed as “multi-purpose” for passengers with baby carriages as well.
